Hannah is the mother of the prophet Samuel, who would play a pivotal role in the monarchies (king Saul and David) that would rule ancient Israel. Hannah birthed the prophet who would anoint king David, the one “after God’s own heart.”¹ It was through Hannah’s anguished prayers and deep longing for a son that Samuel’s life came to be.

As a woman and wife in ancient Israel, to not bear children and particularly sons for your husband was a deep social and familial shame. You weren’t giving your husband heirs to continue the family line. Hannah and her husband’s other wife, Peninah both knew it, too. With this deep longing in her heart, Hannah goes before God in such earnest and intense prayer that Eli the prophet looking on thinks her drunk. Hannah teaches us about prayer, about laying it all out before the LORD, not suppressing, repressing, or withholding emotion from God or from ourselves—especially painful emotions. She is a model for us, a mother in the faith of trusting God with our heart’s deepest desires.

It’s through the prayers of his mother Hannah that Samuel becomes the great servant of the LORD that he was. Because she prayed for him and kept her word to give him back to the LORD, he became who he was called to be.
